

23 Points of View

a Book of Eletrographic Photographs

by Joel David Sanderson

23 Points of View
a Book of Electrographic Photographs
by Joel David Sanderson

copyright 1989
Published by Artificial Happy
(* 28)

I often give myself assignments... this is one of a series of photos taken of the porch behind an apartment I lived in (its turned sideways)

I saw this window at the cable company as I was paying my bill.

While walking home I noticed the backside of a highrise apartment building.

A fire escape cast heavy shadows at noontime,
when I worked downtown.

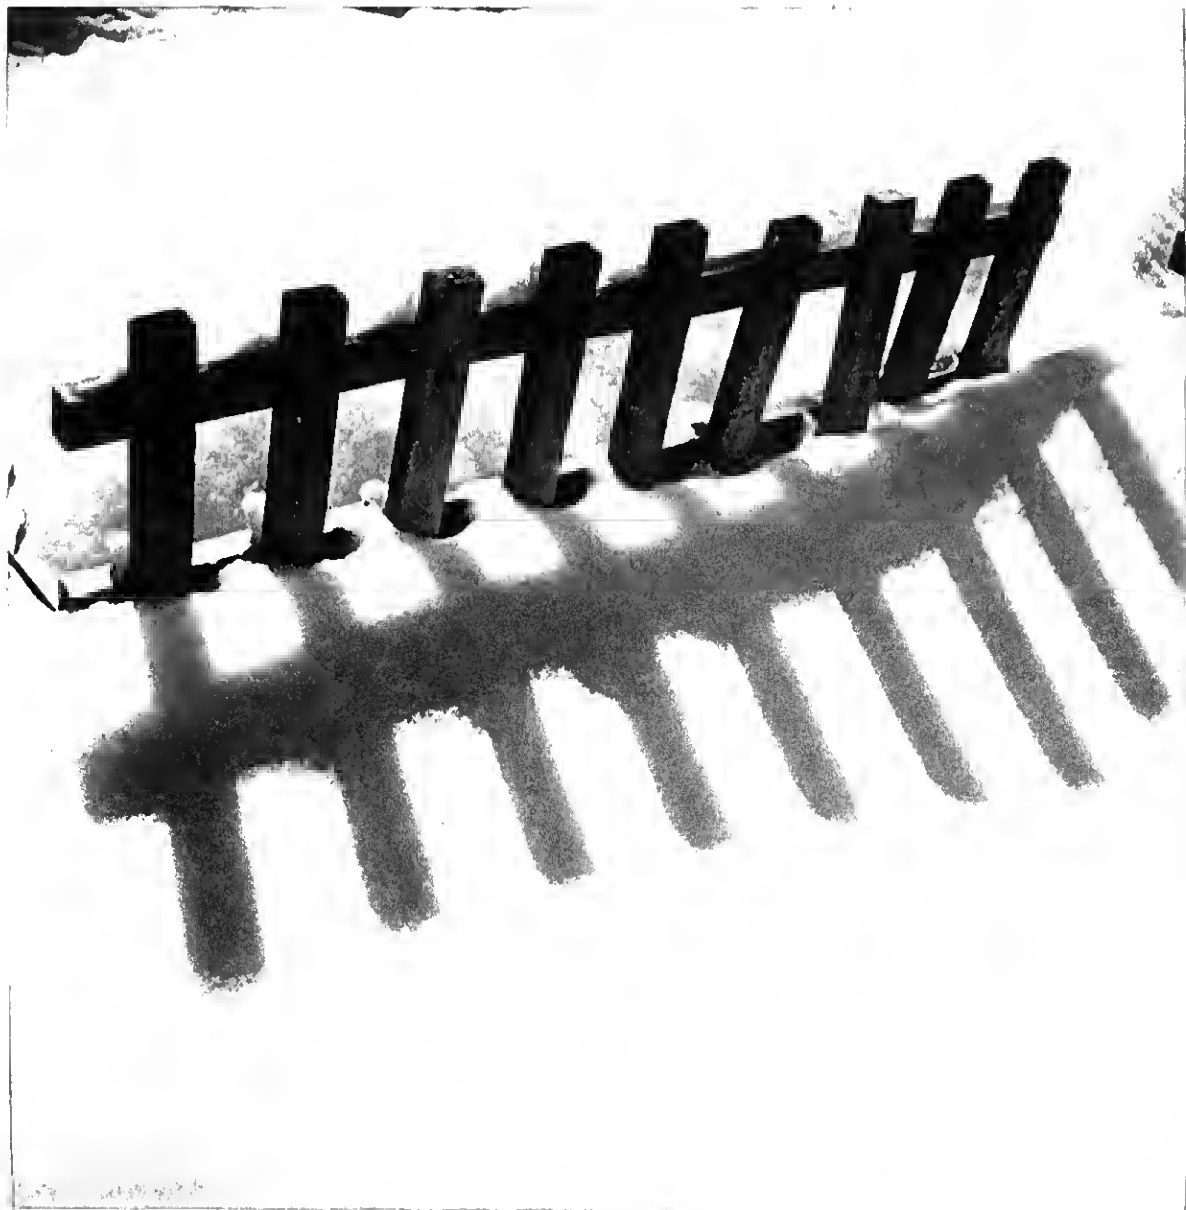

The side of this parking garage was textured into this hypnotic pattern.

Noontime shadows of a fire escape drawn
over the lime stone of the Scottish Rites Temple, in Wichita

I took alot of photos at an air show, but the hanger door for the B-1 bomber was more striking than the plane itself.

A flower bed in a winter snow.

I love the way blinds break up the light as it enters a window.

I took a series of photos of art gallery windows, while in San Fransico.... this is my favorite.

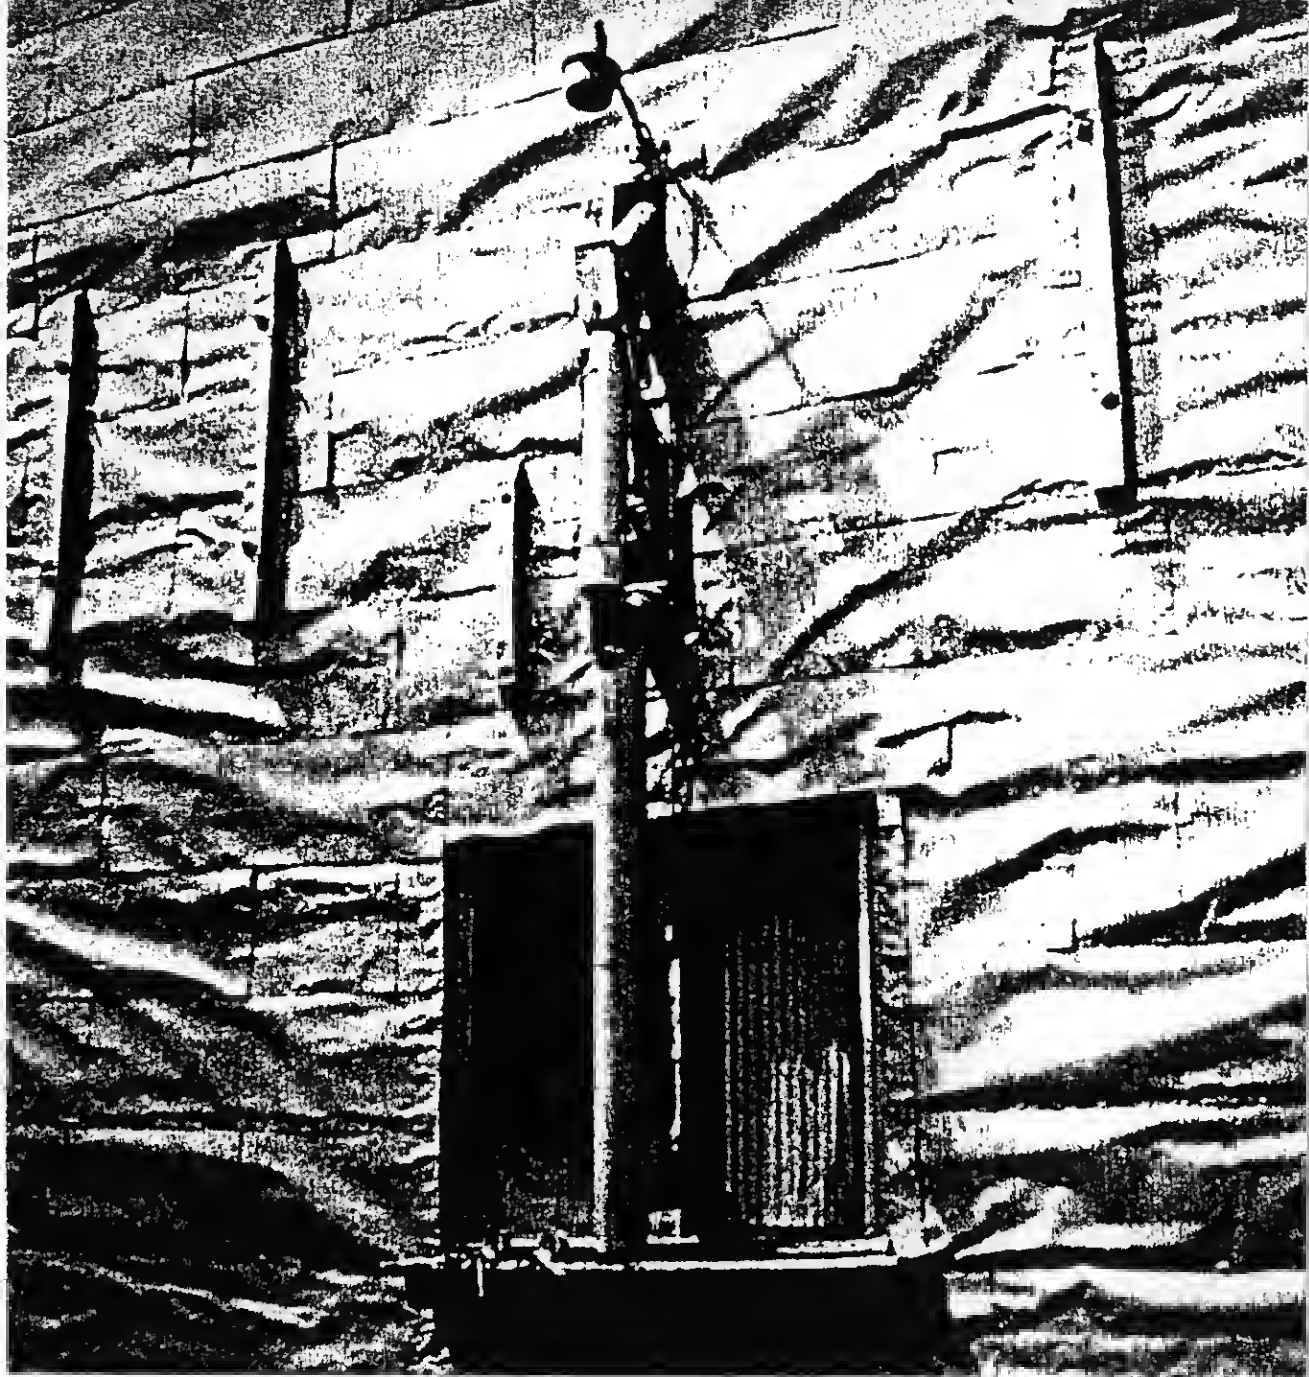

Stopped at a stoplight I noticed the shadow of a no parking sign, cast on a wall.

San Francisco was a great place to study chance line designs that occur in larger cities.

I was parked at a fastfood resturant eating a hamburger, when I looked up and saw this house.

On the way back from the Garden of Eden in Dexter Ks., we passed by this grain elevator with its wrinkled tin sides.

I took this standing on both railings of a stairway, looking straight down.

A water fountain was being cleaned as I passed it one evening.

I was going through the Drive through of a bank
and these bars formed patterns over me (this ones turned upside down too).

Parking garages provide an interesting variety of light and shadow through their minimal design.

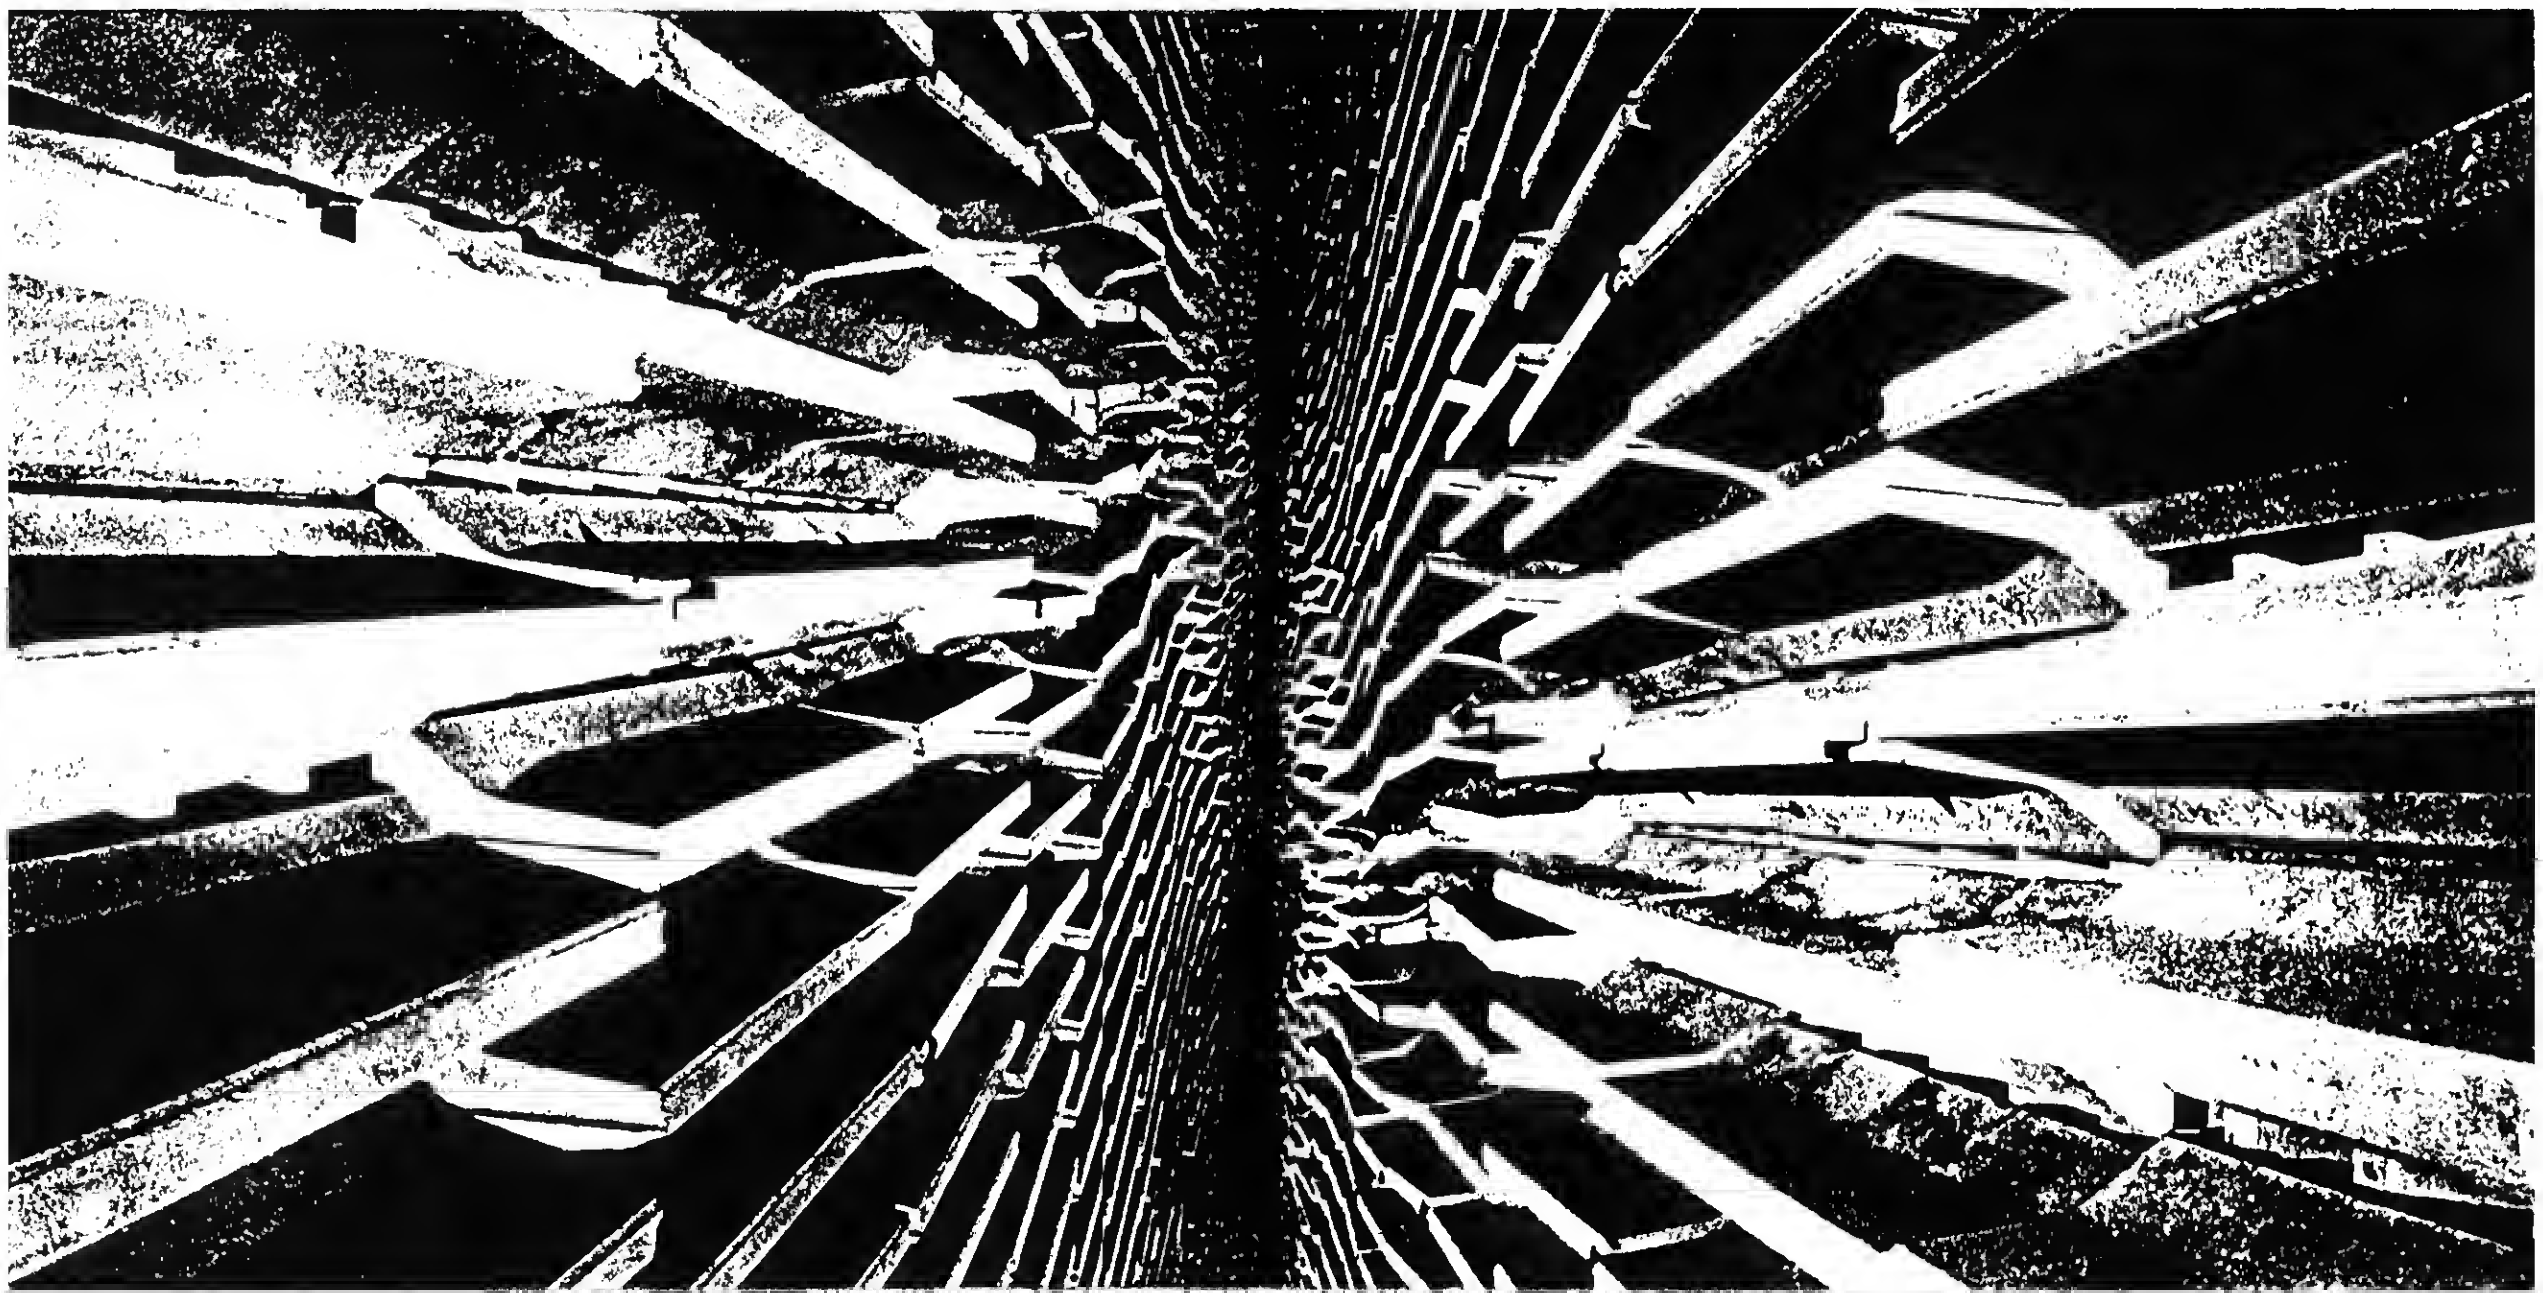

Kris (my girlfriend) was asleep on the couch,
and the sun was shining through the blinds.

This was taken on the 8th floor of the old Macy's building in Wichita, these chairs were stored for window displays

This is a rock at the Wichita, Zoo with the shadow of a fence cast across its face

Driving down a highway, I came across a place where highway construction barriers were stored, stacked three deep and covering hundreds of acres (This is two separate photos turned in on each other)